Legalizing marijuana as a federal-level medicinal substance benefits the federal budget, by allowing the production of the plant. The National Academy Press estimated that 10% of the total population of the United States will be able to benefit from the medicinal properties of the plant. In the past, the plant has been used to treat a wide range of ailments, including chronic pain, depression, and anxiety. It has also been used to treat a variety of other conditions, including cancer, HIV/AIDS, and multiple sclerosis. Legalizing marijuana on a federal level would provide economic benefits for the United States in the billions, precisely at a time when the federal economy needs a major boost. It's not just the feds, however, who would benefit; legalization would provide top-down economic improvements in local communities, state coffers, and more. In addition to bringing in funds, it would save regional and state governments substantial sums in currently wasted law enforcement dollars.
