Germany took six weeks to put up this tent,
1200 years to put on the show inside.
Come to Montreal and take a look. It's some tent.

Flash the words, it's staggering. A tent of such scale, suspended on eight giant masts, occupies a transitional ground: urban, but outside the area of a city block.

Now sit, you don't really grasp its size until you enter inside. The roof is a cathedral to show you. And all around in early hours like a surreal landscape is Germany. The Germany of the past, of today and tomorrow.

For this, Architecture and Design is the German Pavilion at Expo 67, 1967.

Germany of all sorts, substantial, in Montreal, Canada.

The German Pavilion is not what you might expect. There's no history of foreign contacts to follow. This is a place to relax in, to breathe in. To take in the atmosphere. And to explore one of a hundred facets of Germany's arts, science and history, as you leave.

You can see medieval sculpture or modern pottery design. Compare the intricacy of oil motor engines, the Daimler, with the motor of the future, the Wankel. Or the first Mercedes car with the latest. Watch the Gutenberg Press reproduce a page of the first printed bible. Listen to Beethoven and ... the Best Music of the night in the tent, and whimsical model railroad near by.

Order one corner of this vast, airy canopy you can go to a concert or a film show in the theatre. In another, three restaurants restaurants offer you an intimate (like the Dierckx in the old century Berlin).

Doesn't it all sound well worth a trip to Montreal? Then consider this. In the wonderful world of Expo 67, the pavilions of 15 other nations, each fascinating in its own way, are waiting for you. Accommodations? Call (514) 397-8267 for immediate reservations and information. Or write, mentioning dates and type of accommodations preferred, to LOGIXPO, Expo 67, Montreal, P.Q., Canada.
